What is Mitochondrial Disease?

Mitochondria exist in nearly every cell of the human body, producing 90 percent of the energy the body needs to function. In a person with mitochondrial disease, the mitochondria are failing and cannot convert food and oxygen into life-sustaining energy. For many, mitochondrial disease is an inherited genetic condition, while for others the body's mitochondria can be affected by other environmental factors. To learn more: www.umdf.org and www.mitoaction.org “Magic Bracelets” will be available for purchase at the celebration to support research towards a cure for mitochondrial disease.
